Gayle Cook Junior Historian Program
The History Center is proud to present The Gayle Cook Junior Historian Summer Program for youth of Monroe and surrounding counties. The Junior Historian Program is designed to immerse children, in two groups, ages 6-8 and 9-12, in a living history experience. During three separate themed weeks throughout the summer, children will be able to touch history in ways they never have. By using historically accurate activities, food and field trips, the campers will experience the rich history of Monroe County and Indiana, in a lasting, meaningful way. Instructors will be trained and experienced working with children.

The program to serve the youth in the area was named in honor of Gayle Cook in recognition of her commitment to preservation of history and unfailing support given the Monroe County Historical Society and its History Center.

Message from the Board President

On a sunny October day, the Cemetery Committee spent the day at Keller Cemetery near Stanford in western Monroe County. We assisted in repairing and cleaning gravestones, cleared out underbrush and, most importantly, honored those who have come before us. As I cleaned the gravestone of a boy who died shortly after he was born in the mid-1850s, I was reminded of the legacy left us by our pioneer ancestors. Whether we were born in Monroe County or have moved here, it is our home and a place worthy of preserving the history and stories for our children and those who come to this place after us.

We are working in many ways to do just that. Our new Gayle Cook Junior Historian Program will begin this summer to help children learn more about Monroe County and our history. Our collaboration with Indiana University to train area teachers in the Teaching American History project is another example of our commitment to the education of our history. We recently received the Henry and Cecelia Wahl grant to assist with transporting Monroe County school students on field trips (which had been cut from local school budgets).

Our Fourth Annual Gala will be held February 11 at Cook World Headquarters. Local author and Indiana State University professor, Mike Shelden, will share stories of his travels and interviews with newsmakers of our time. James Madison, Indiana University’s Thomas and Kathryn Miller Professor of History, will be our Master of Ceremonies. We will again have a Silent Auction which will include some special antiques from our Garage Sale donations. Please join us for an evening to remember.

Mark Your Calendar: IGS April 2011 Conference
The Indiana Genealogical Society’s annual conference will be held on Saturday, 16 April 2011, in the Sterrett Center at Fort Harrison in northeastern Indianapolis. The featured speaker will be Diane VanSkiver Gagel, past president of the Ohio Genealogical Society and author of several books, including Windows on the Past: Identifying, Dating, and Preserving Photographs. DeKalb County Museums
Many people are familiar with the Auburn Cord Duesenberg Automotive Museum in Auburn, Indiana, but DeKalb County offers nine other museums in Auburn and environs. Continuing the transportation theme are the National Automotive and Truck Museum, Kruse Automotive & Carriage Museum, Early Ford V-8 Museum, Hoosier Air Museum, and Garrett Historical Railroad Museum. For family history researchers, the DeKalb County History Museum and Willennar Genealogy Center (in Auburn’s Eckhart Public Library) are worth a visit. Other interests are served by the National Military History Center and the Garrett Museum of Art. The DeKalb Alliance of Museums offers a Passport Ticket: by paying regular admission at one of the museums, the purchaser receives discounts at all of the others. For more information on any of these museums, contact: DeKalb County Visitors Bureau, telephone: (260) 927-1499; or go to: www.dekalbcvb.org (From DeKalb Alliance of Museums brochure.)

WWI Posters at Indiana Historical Society
The Indiana Historical Society’s World War I Poster Collection, which includes American propaganda posters from around 1918, is now available to researchers. The posters reflect the varying missions of the organizations that produced them. French Relief Fund posters were produced by the Indianapolis branch of the American Fund for French Wounded, organized in 1915 to support French hospitals. Many of these posters feature soldiers and girls; each includes a humorous poem. Posters promoting Liberty Loan Campaigns and Bonds urge the purchase of bonds as a patriotic duty. Red Cross posters focus on fundraising for humanitarian and medical aid to Europe. The U.S. Food Administration posters advocate conserving food (to make more available for overseas allies) as well as raising and canning homegrown produce. Posters of ships under construction, produced by the U.S. Shipping Board Emergency Fleet, emphasize the need to expand the Merchant Marine and move people and supplies to Europe. Indiana artists represented in the collection include Franklin Booth, Kin Hubbard, John T. McCutcheon, and Gaar Williams. For more information, go to: www.indianahistory.org/library or telephone: (317) 234-0321. (From INPerspective, November/December 2010, and the web site.)

Your Donations at Work
Donations Make A Difference

Every year the History Center raises operating funds by selling donated gently-used merchandise. What makes this increasingly profitable is the warehousing we have available for storage throughout the year. This means that we accept individually donated items and also large estates whenever they become available.

After removing any artifacts appropriate for the Museum’s collection we then sell merchandise at several events resulting in a major addition to our budget.

The Racial Divide in 1915 Bloomington

By Lee Ehman

While indexing obituaries from the Bloomington Telephone, I ran across a 1915 event that reveals a Bloomington different than it is today. The episode exemplifies the psychological divide between blacks and whites that can be traced in the history of the state. Before the Civil War, anti-black feelings in Indiana were typified by the 1851 Constitutional Convention’s Article XIII, later overwhelmingly confirmed by a state-wide vote: “No negro or mulatto shall come into or settle in the State…”1 The article, however, was not generally enforced. Indiana had a history of lynching in the 1800s; 20 blacks were lynched between 1865 and 1903. Anti-lynch laws were finally enforced by Governor Winfield Durbin in the early 1900s.2

In 1915, Bloomington was segregated. Blacks lived separately from whites, and one area was given the derogatory label “Bucktown” by the Telephone. The paper segregated social news about blacks into the column “Among Colored People,” almost always carried on page four, a small section set apart from the main “One Day of Local Doings.” Occasionally deaths of prominent black citizens were announced outside this section, but nearly all their news was carried in it. There was a separate “colored school,” which previously occupied the Carnegie Library site, now part of the History Center. In December 1915, a new “colored school,” now the Banneker Center, opened on West Seventh with 93 students.3 As the new school was being planned, a nearby church protested its location so close to their house of worship.

From 11 to 14 August 1915, a series of front-page articles in the Telephone reported on the showing of The Nigger at the Princess Theatre. On August 11th, the Telephone described a petition to the city council, “signed by practically every colored person in Bloomington,” to prohibit showing the picture. The document was presented by Reverend Henderson, pastor of the Bethel African Methodist Episcopal (A.M.E.) church, who explained “…the picture might cause a race feeling here and it was best to prohibit it. He explained that the picture was a southern film, contains a scene where a negro attempts to criminally assault a white woman and is afterwards taken by a mob. [He] held that the picture portrayed a degraded scene and was unfair to the colored race.”4

The Nigger was nearly forgotten today, partly because four weeks earlier, Epoch Film released its infamous The Birth of a Nation, which was for that time a blockbuster. The Nigger, produced by Fox, was based on a 1912 play of the same name, in which the title character, the governor of Georgia, was discovered to have black ancestors. He resigned and “gave up” his white fiancée, even though in the final scene she was willing to “overlook his black blood” and marry him.5 Despite its inflammatory title, the play was viewed by some as “a prominent defense of miscegenation.”6 In the end the hero, rather than denying his black ancestry, decided to devote his life to the betterment of blacks.6 The film (but presumably not the play) contained scenes showing a “Negro hiding behind a tree waiting to assault [a] little white girl, the dead child, the manhunt, the flames indicating the lynching and burning at the stake, and a ‘race war’ during which whites were killed by Negroes.”7 A more sanguine view is that “Despite its title the movie was an indictment of intemperance and intolerance even to the point of putting responsibility for racism squarely on bigoted whites.”

On 12 August 1915, the Telephone carried a short article announcing that the film would be screened privately for the mayor, city council, and city attorney. “They will consider the question if the showing of the picture is likely to cause any race feeling in Bloomington.”8 The following day, the Telephone reported that the city administrators “could see nothing in it to excite race feeling” and decided it would be shown that night as advertised. “About 15 people made up the audience for the private show, including a number of ladies—A.C. Coyle, representing the city council, said of the film: ‘I see nothing in the picture that might cause unusual unrest among the negroes, and if anything it teaches a good moral lesson that would prove uplifting to the colored race.’”9

Juxtaposing Reverend Henderson’s and A. C. Coyle’s statements shows mutual fear of the “other.” Henderson’s concern about “race feeling” reflected the history of brutal intimidation of blacks by whites from the days of slavery up to the present. Coyle was worried about unrest among blacks, not about the white lynch mobs that Henderson feared. Coyle’s statement is also remarkable for its assertion that “the colored race” needed moral lessons. We don’t know directly what he or she had in mind, but the “lesson” might well have been that blacks needed to keep their place or be “taken by a mob.”

First Birdman in Bloomington

By Lee Ehman

In the aviation display case in the museum on the Monroe County History Center’s second floor, near the Schmaltz Bear, visitors see a small piece of round wood, labeled “From the first airplane that came to Bloomington. Fell near Dunn Meadow.” Donated by the Wylie House Museum, the artifact has no other identifying information.

A series of October 1911 Bloomington Daily Telephone articles reveal the story behind that bit of bamboo. Town merchants of the Commercial Club had formed the Booster Day committee to promote business. They contracted for $700 with the Curtiss Aviation Company to perform two airplane flights for the large crowd they hoped to draw into Bloomington. The first newspaper headline was “‘Birdman’ with Machine Coming.” It included an invitation to mayors and other officials from the surrounding area: “Take a ride in the air ship, and listen to the band play. Welcome to our city. There will be a hot time…stand on the hub of the wheel of the center of population and feel the world go around.” The next day’s paper published a long, rather ghoulish, article on aviation deaths. Perhaps this was also part of the attempt to draw a large gathering for the event.

Three days before the planned flights in Bloomington, a Curtiss pilot was killed in Seattle, and the company indicated it might not be able to fly. But the Booster Day committee threatened a lawsuit for breach of contract. A substitute flier, Horace F. Kearney, arrived on 10 October with his airplane and mechanics. Kearney had been injured in August, staying in a hospital for six weeks. According to a history of early aviation, “Horace F. Kearney [was] known among his fellow aviators as ‘Sure Shot Kearney’ because of his claim that he could take his Curtiss biplane off a nickel and land it on a postage stamp…”

The crew had to assemble the airplane, shipped in pieces via railroad, and wanted a quiet place to work. But the Booster Day committee insisted the crew put it together on the town square, to keep the people near their businesses.

On 11 October, the crew made their way to Dunn Meadow and made ready for the first of two scheduled flights in front of what the newspaper describes as a crowd of thousands. Apparently Kearney decided to take off toward the east, starting in the west end of what was then a rutted former farmer’s field. While Kearney did spot a post at the far end, he neglected to see the barbed wire fence the post supported. The uneven ground prevented him from gaining as much speed as he expected, and, suddenly, he saw the fence close at hand. He hauled back on the controls to raise the nose and clear the fence, but stalled, pivoted to one side, and crashed, the right wing catching a tree. This was lucky, because he was thrown clear to the...
The rebuilt machine in St. Louis. In December, he flew at Atchison, Kansas, with crutches lashed to his plane. A year later, in what was to be his last flight, he attempted to fly a “hydro-aeroplane” from Los Angeles to San Francisco on 15 December 1912. Sadly, he crashed in the ocean off Redondo Beach and was never found.

In Bloomington, the Commercial Club tried again. On 7 June 1912, they held another Booster Day with an airplane flight from Dunn Meadow. This time, the plane actually flew for a crowd of 7,000, although “…tricky air currents compelled Spauling [the pilot] to bring his machine to the ground.” During his landing, Spauling crashed into a fence while avoiding power and telephone lines.

One hundred years later, we salute these brave pioneer pilots who added their colorful chapters to Monroe County’s rich history.

Revised Probate Records Index Available
The Genealogy Library’s finding aid for probate records has been recently re-indexed, eliminating errors and omissions in the old version, and is available in a new printout prepared by Elizabeth Schlemmer, Randi Richardson, and Lee Ehman. Monroe County Probate Records, 1818–1872 lists the parties alphabetically by last name, includes the box and folder number, and provides a description telling whether the documents deal with heirs, a guardianship, or an estate.

Cemetery Iconography Case Exhibit
A new exhibit, “Tombstone Art and Iconography,” is on display near the entrance to the Genealogy Library. Volunteers Sarah Rosencrans and Lauren Baker assisted in the design of the exhibit, and Lauren also contributed photographs. Volunteer Laura McIntosh loaned the top of a grave marker found in a Monroe County barn. The exhibit explores the variety and meaning of the symbols and images that appear on tombstones. For example, wheat sheaves symbolize a call to heaven (at harvest time in the autumn of life), an obelisk indicates an important person, and a column stands for the death of a patriarch. Other examples include flowers and their meanings; religious, fraternal, and military symbols; and various shapes and design elements, such as angels, cherubs, and hands.

On August 14, the day after the film’s showing, two articles appeared. One stated that “The film was generally pronounced one of the best ever shown here. Many colored people attended the show.”¹¹ The other article reproduced a letter to the editor from Reverend R. M. H. Henderson elaborating his objection to the film. His passionate argument tied the film to the “degredation [sic] and damning blight of slavery.” He stated that “The half-nude slave gang, the shackles, the overseer, whip, lynch law in the rarest and most improbable form portrayed, deduct a conclusion that disfranchisement is justified on negro identity….” He concluded by warning of the destruction of democracy.¹²

The film generated determined opposition from the NAACP and elsewhere, forcing Fox to rename it The New Governor and delete some of its most degrading and violent scenes.¹³ Several cities banned screening of the film, including Philadelphia, Cleveland, and Toledo. It is unclear whether Bloomington saw the original or a censored version.

The incident shows the very different views held by whites and blacks. It also highlights the unique role of the A.M.E. church in articulating the black viewpoint. Bloomington had no other voice in 1915 that could advocate for the benefit of the black community.¹⁴ Reverend Henderson, like other black ministers of his time, spoke for that community; otherwise, The Nigger would have been another of the many unremarked-upon expressions of black inferiority and white supremacy.

Update: Michael’s 1830 Emancipation
By Lee Ehman

In the February 2004 Monroe County Historian, I reported on the 1830 emancipation of a slave, Michael, by Richard McCorkle. I asked readers to add information they might have. James Matthew Richmond has provided additional details that offer interesting insights.

Michael (also referred to as Micah), then a young boy, was willed to Richard McCorkle by his father in a 26 December 1816 will recorded in Rutherford County, Tennessee. The will specified that “I will my son Richard B. my negro boy Micah till he is twenty eight years of age, then to be set free if prudent and safe, otherwise to remain his property.”

According to Mr. Richmond, it is possible that Michael’s mother was Dinah, or Dine, enumerated in the 1820 Sumner County, Tennessee, U.S. Census, and who was freed by Richard McCorkle in his will (“I will my negro woman Dine to be considered as free, only under care and direction and government of my heirs”). Presumably this happened in 1818 when the will was probated.

Mr. Richmond also cited family records indicating that Richard McCorkle, a minister, at one time came from Tennessee to live in New Harmony, Indiana, during its early utopian years, but became disenchanted there. It is unclear when he came to Monroe County. At some point, he moved on to Washington, Illinois, in Tazewell County, where he started the Christian Church in 1831. Michael, now freed, accompanied them to Illinois, working on establishing their home and farm there. It is not known how long he stayed with the family.

Update: Hitchrack “Down” around the Square
By Penelope Mathiesen

When did the hitchrack around Bloomington’s courthouse square finally come down? In an earlier issue of the Monroe County Historian (October 2008), I reported that the hitchrack probably went out of use during the 1920s, and that it disappeared from contemporary photographs sometime during the 1930s. More precise information has now come to light in the form of the following newspaper article.

Indianapolis Star, 8 January 1937

WHOA, DOBBIN! YOU’RE DONE AT BLOOMINGTON

City employes [sic] with acetylene torches, heavy wrenches and crowbars started the task this afternoon of removing Monroe county’s public relic of the horse and buggy days—the hitchrack around the public square. Mayor A. H. Berndt received permission yesterday from the county commissioners to have the iron railings and water troughs, standbys of old Dobbin, removed. The city wrecking crew expects the task to consume another day.
